

Arrowhead JP is reassigned

Phillip Woolbright can't hear cases in his own courtroom and is told to hear civil cases in Buckeye during ethics inquiry.

PAGE 4

Fan favorite Gonzo recounts his life

Retired Arizona Diamondbacks player Luis Gonzalez was a featured speaker at the Hispanic Heritage Breakfast in Glendale.

PAGE 5

SPORTS

Cactus football regroups

Glendale high school team will try to improve for a possible rematch in the Division III state playoffs with Saguaro.

PAGE 8

NEW LIFE FOR OLD INN

The historic Gaslight Inn building will re-open next month as a bed-and-breakfast with a wine bar next door. The project is the dream of a California couple who lost their first bed-and-breakfast to a fire.

PAGE 3

(Top) Pete Gliniak, an owner of the historic Gaslight Inn in downtown Glendale, moves in new furniture. Nicko Partida works on cabinets at the Gaslight Inn. PHOTOS BY NICK OZATHE REPUBLIC

The Home of Remarkable RE-BATH & KITCHENS

Free In-Home Design Consultation

FREE Bedroom Carpet
Up to 120 sq. ft. Free estimate & installation

Design Your Bathroom Online at ReBathandKitchens.com
480-998-8900

PEORIA SE Corner of 75th Ave & Bell Rd
SCOTTSDALE SE Corner of Granite Reef Rd & McDonald

OUR VIEW

One-size-fits-all state laws harms local control

PAGE 10

INDEX

News	3-5
West Valley Living	6-7
Sports	8-9
Opinions	10-11

ALSO SERVING: LUKE AIR FORCE BASE

Gaslight Inn is couple's wish come true

By Rebekah L. Sanders
The Republic | azcentral.com

A devastating fire in California nearly ruined their dream. But a small "For Sale" sign at the Gaslight Inn in downtown Glendale reignited it.

Now, real-estate brokers Teresa Outzen and Pete Gliniak have fulfilled their aspiration of owning a bed-and-breakfast.

They plan to reopen the 1926-era hotel, at 5747 W. Glendale Ave., next month and launch a wine and beer bar next door. In another six to eight months, they hope to have a steakhouse and coffee shop running on the inn's first floor.

The couple say getting the Gaslight going again, after a 2½-year vacancy, and adding new dining choices will give a shot of energy to the area.

"That's how little old downtowns rejuvenate themselves," the 55-year-old Gliniak said. He pointed to the example of Pasadena, Calif., which reinvented its downtown and now bustles with visitors. The city became a model for Glendale officials wanting to do the same thing.

Glendale leaders in partnership with downtown business owners three years ago began a revitalization campaign for the Glendale Avenue corridor called the Centerline project, aiming to attract more shops, restaurants and living spaces to ratchet up an urban vibe. The Gaslight Inn takes one empty building off the market.

"We're moving the needle on Centerline forward," Glendale economic-development director Brian Friedman said. "One success begets another."

Friedman noted three other large buildings that were priorities have been filled in the past year: The Beet Sugar Factory, which will become a distillery and tasting room; the former Maricopa County Superior Court satellite branch; and retail space at the bottom of the city-owned parking garage Promenade at Palmyra, both occupied by Southwest Ambulance.

The last large vacant building in downtown is the city-owned Bead Museum, Friedman said. Once that is filled, it should be easier to find tenants for smaller closed shops on the blocks off of Glendale Avenue, he said.

The Gaslight wouldn't have come back to life under Outzen and Gliniak if a similar project hadn't turned to ashes.

The couple were in the midst of renovating a 1911 Craftsman house in their hometown of Covina, Calif., in 2009 when a fire broke out. It burned the planned bed-and-breakfast to the ground, taking with it thousands of dollars' worth of restoration

Pete Gliniak, co-owner of the historic Gaslight Inn in downtown Glendale, is reflected in the mirror of an 1890 bar imported from England that will be installed in the wine bar. NICK OZA/THE REPUBLIC

FORMER LIVES OF THE GASLIGHT INN

The red-brick building, 5747 W. Glendale Ave., at various times has held a Masonic lodge, five-and-dime store, furniture store, warehouse and inn. Longtime downtown businessman Jim Eggleston owned the inn for 30 years, before selling it to a couple from San Francisco in 2005.

work and city permits.

"Everything was lost," Gliniak said.

"It took us a solid year to get over that (emotionally)," Outzen, 45, said.

They weren't sure if they would ever try again.

But last winter, on a vacation to Arizona, they stopped to visit downtown Glendale. The city's annual holiday festival Glendale Glitters was in full swing, so they strolled the quaint streets lined with historic red-brick buildings and were reminded of Covina.

Then, they spotted the "For Sale" sign in the window of the Gaslight Inn. It "rekindled the dream all over again," Gliniak said.

In the past few months at the inn, they've painted over pink shades in the 10 bedrooms, stained the wood floors dark, trucked in loads of beds, draperies and vintage armoires and made plans to install an elevator. For the wine bar, Gliniak found an 1890 carved mahogany bar with etched mirrors imported from England. Wine barrels will serve as planters outside.

The couple's plans are ambitious.

Outzen and Gliniak haven't run a bed-and-breakfast before. And they don't plan to live in Glendale full time, but instead will hire a staff of 10 or so to run the inn and wine bar.

The previous owners also were a California couple, successful financially, who dreamed of operating a bed-and-breakfast and fell in love with the building on a visit to Arizona. They bought the inn near the height of the market in 2005, embarked on major renovations and ran a wine bar and coffee shop inside the inn, with frequent jazz nights.

In 2009, the owners lost the two-story building to foreclosure and later declared personal bankruptcy.

But Outzen and Gliniak say their endeavor will be different.

The previous owners paid $1.15 million for the inn. Outzen, with partial investment from her father, paid less than half, at $550,000.

"They were overleveraged, and it crushed them," Gliniak said. "All (our) work is being paid for. It's not financed. This is playtime."

Bed-and-breakfasts rarely run several eateries, but the arrangement could provide a valuable source of income to the operation, said Paul Hedger, a Tucson innkeeper and president of the Arizona Association of Bed and Breakfast Inns.

"If they do it well, people that stay at the bed-and-breakfast will also enjoy going to the restaurant," Hedger said. He said inns are assets, especially to historic downtowns aiming for a revival, because of the clientele they draw.

Guests eat at area restaurants and buy gifts for family and friends at area stores, Hedger said.

"They're not just coming for a football game or going to a casino to blow their $200 or $300," he said. "They're plowing real money into the community."

Brett Hoffman, owner of the German restaurant and bar Haus Murphy's, said he welcomes the idea of a wine bar, steakhouse, coffee shop and revived Gaslight Inn on the same block.

"The more we can get, the better for everyone down here," he said.